Diverging Globalizations:

National and Sectoral Pathways to Development in China and India

BY

ROSELYN HSUEH

Associate Professor of Political Science, Temple University

FRIDAY, MARCH 17, 2017 ♦ 12 noon to 1:30 p.m. at CASI

3600 Market Street, Suite 560 (5th floor) ♦ Philadelphia, PA 19104

ROSELYN HSUEH is an Associate Professor of Political Science at Temple University. She is completing a book manuscript that investigates the mediating role of market governance in the relationship between global economic integration and industrial development in China, India, and Russia. Her other research examines the politics of trade and the political economy of identity. She is the author of China's Regulatory State: A New Strategy for Globalization (Cornell Studies in Political Economy, 2011). She has been published in Comparative Political Studies and Governance. She earned a Ph.D. from the University of California-Berkeley.

About the Lecture:

China and India are two large, developing countries that have globalized and undergone tremendous development in the last several decades. Yet, they have taken separate paths toward globalization. Dr. Hsueh questions the conventional wisdom that variation in regime type and subnational characteristics shape their different models of development. Rather, mediating the impact of economic liberalization on industrialization is the nature of market governance. Dominant patterns of market governance, which shape industrial outcomes, are a function of the values and identities of political economic elites, existing organization of institutions, and structural sectoral attributes.

About CASI

Founded in 1992, the Center for the Advanced Study of India (CASI) at Penn is the first research institution in the U.S. dedicated to the study of contemporary India. The Center's key goals are to nurture a new generation of scholars across disciplines and to provide a forum for dialogue among the academic, business, and foreign policy communities.

About CSCC

Established in 2012, the Center for the Study of Contemporary China (CSCC) advances Penn's leadership in programs, research, and scholarship about the political, legal, economic, and social factors shaping China and its role in the world today. The Center sustains and extends the University's work on and partnerships in China, providing an institutional home for campus-wide collaboration among departments, programs, institutes, faculty and students at Penn engaged in work pertaining to contemporary China.
